Preface

This is a revised version of the descriptive catalogue to the John Foster Dulles Oral History Collection which was first published in 1967 and subsequently revised by Nancy Bressler in 1974.

In general, the revisions to the original catalogue have primarily been updates regarding the status of collections due to the passage of time. Restrictions on access or copying have been revised for many of the interviewees. Library staff contacted donors and heirs to allow as full an access as possible. The library has also lifted its restrictions on interlibrary loan of the interviews and plans a microfilm edition of the interviews in the near future. Additional information about the records relating to John Foster Dulles available in Princeton University Library is now available in the introductory sections of this catalogue.

The major change to this catalogue is rather its new format, achieved by a conversion to desktop publishing software, thanks to the keyboarding swiftness of Alison McCuaig and the computer wizardry of Edward J. Jaramillo, Princeton University Class of 1996. In addition, for the first time the catalogue has an index which will enable future researchers to identify those interviews which deal with particular subjects. Mr. Jaramillo is solely responsible for this excellent improvement to the catalogue.

Foreword
Considering the linear mileage of the words written and spoken about John Foster Dulles during his lifetime and since, the public image of the late Secretary of State remains curiously distorted. As a man, he is widely believed to have been ponderous, humorless, Puritanical, cold, forbidding, austere, and unbending. His foreign policy has been commonly characterized as doctrinaire, rigid, static, legalistic, moralistic, inflexible, and high-handed.

In some measure, Dulles himself contributed to his own caricature. If it helped to convince the world, and especially the Communist part of it, that the United States meant business and that its announced policies had backbone and muscle, then Dulles was not averse to being pictured personally as hard-nosed and unyielding. Moreover, in an age of expanding bureaucracy characterized by the rise of the "faceless man," Dulles was strongly idiosyncratic; and nothing serves the purposes of caricature like idiosyncracy. The lineaments of his features, his mind, and his character were strong -- and they bred strong reactions. More than he intended, he satisfied the hunger of the American press and public for stereotypes. And while Dulles himself was complex, his stereotype perforce was simple. While he grew in his job as Secretary of State, while he changed, revised, modified, qualified, and even occasionally yielded, the stereotype remained fixed and static.

Whatever else the interviews catalogued here accomplish, they should help to dissipate some of the myths that sprang up in Secretary Dulles' wake and to correct some popular misapprehensions about him. He did not do, think, or say many of the things commonly attributed to him; and conversely he did, thought, and said a number of things seldom associated with his name. No thoughtful reader of any considerable number of these transcripts could possibly persist in picturing Mr. Dulles in the harsh outlines described above. Nor can the pat pejoratives of "doctrinaire," "rigid," "static," etc. any longer be acceptable as apt descriptions of his foreign policy.

As a note of caution, however, the student of these transcripts should be reminded that this collection is itself somewhat lopsided.

Most of the witnesses whose testimony is here recorded were "friendly." Many made an obvious effort to be objective; some were critical; but very few could be called "hostile." This is not the fault of the Dulles Oral History Project, its directors, advisers, or interviewers. Opinions of all sorts were solicited, but in most instances witnesses who presumably might have been unfriendly to Dulles simply refused to testify. If their refusals have produced an imbalance in this collection, the flaw, however regrettable, is hardly fatal. The case for the prosecution is documented elsewhere in detail, and anyone searching for unfavorable comments on Mr. Dulles will not have far to look.

The final "judgment of history" on John Foster Dulles will of course depend largely on who writes the histories and when they are written. No serious history of the man or of his work can henceforth by undertaken, however, without a thorough examination of these transcripts.

The three blind men of ancient fable, after groping sightlessly around the body of an elephant, respectively identified the object under scrutiny as a tree trunk, a serpent, and a piece of rope. If the three had been three hundred, and if their separate findings had been collated by an intelligent naturalist, no doubt the elephant would have been fully identified and described. Without imputing blindness, or even myopia, to any of the witnesses whose testimony is collected here, I would urge the scholar who uses this collection to play the role of the intelligent naturalist. No single transcript among these 282 affords a complete and accurate picture of John Foster Dulles or even any one phase of his life. Put them together and a reasonably authentic and three-dimensional likeness will emerge.

Introduction
"Oral history" -- a term that has been applied to the research technique of tape-recording spoken reminiscences and transcribing them nearly verbatim into manuscript form -- is not a new idea. It was conceived by Allan Nevins, who established the first oral history office at Columbia University in 1948 for the purpose of recording for posterity the recollections of living men and women who have participated in important events or contributed significantly to the social and cultural life of twentieth-century America. During the past two decades this new research genre has gained almost world-wide acceptance, and every year new applications are found for preserving spoken testimony which would otherwise be lost to recorded history. It is estimated that over one hundred agencies devoted to oral history programs are now flourishing in the United States and abroad -- ranging from the investigation of a single event to that of epic social movements, from the life of one man to the history of an entire nation.

The Dulles Oral History Project centers on the life of one man and the historical events in which he participated.

In 1959 the Princeton University Library added to its holdings the State and Private Papers of John Foster Dulles, an unprecedented collection of approximately 40,000 documents and 120,000 microfilm copies of material from the official files of the State Department. The possibility of tape-recording the recollections of those who knew and worked with the late Secretary of State seemed to offer an especially appropriate opportunity to supplement this unusual collection. For one thing, extensive and detailed as the Dulles Papers are, there still are gaps, especially concerning the Secretary's private life and early career. Also, the very size of the formal collection presents problems for the scholar who must sift through tens of thousands of pages of documentation to uncover the significant factors which led to any given decision. The historian's task can be considerably simplified by those individuals who actually took part in the transactions and are in a position to offer first hand explanations -- or at least knowledgeable hypotheses -- concerning the sequence of events and the reasoning that lay behind the ultimate action.

The idea of establishing an oral history collection as an adjunct to the Dulles Papers was first explored in 1963 in conversations between William S. Dix, Princeton University Librarian, and John W. Hanes, Jr., and Roderic L. O'Connor, former assistants to Secretary Dulles, who had been active in the negotiations that led to the presentation of the Papers to Princeton. The idea became a reality a little less than a year later when the Rockefeller Foundation awarded the Princeton University Library a grant (later supplemented by private donations) to launch the Dulles Oral History Project (a list of sponsors is found in Appendix A).

In January 1964, a professional Advisory Committee of Historians and former colleagues of Mr. Dulles was named by Princeton's President Robert F. Goheen (see Appendix B). Chaired by Ambassador Hugh S. Cumming, Jr., the Committee offered suggestions concerning the topics that should be covered in the Project's program and helped in drawing up a list of the individuals to be invited to participate in interviews.

At the same time, the services of Philip A. Crowl were enlisted to organize and initiate the program of interviews. Dr. Crowl, a former member of Princeton's Department of History, who had supervised the selection of State Department documents to be included in the Dulles Papers, took a six-month leave from the State Department to accept appointment as the Project's Director. Between February and August 1964, he drew up the procedures which became the basis for the continuing operation of the Project, conducted the necessary preliminary research, including a detailed chronology of the significant occurrences during Mr. Dulles' tenure of office as Secretary of State, and launched the interviewing program.

Two basic decisions were reached at the first meeting of the Advisory Committee on March 18, 1964. The first was that the list of individuals to be invited to contribute interviews should encompass as broad a scope as possible, including not only the principal actors in the events in which Mr. Dulles participated, but anyone who might be able to offer significant information of either a personal or professional nature. To be included were the top officials of the Eisenhower administration, heads of state and foreign ministers, officers of the American and foreign diplomatic corps, members of the Dulles family and their close friends, Mr. Dulles' earlier associates at the Versailles Peace Conference, on Wall Street, on the Federal Council of Churches, in the United Nations, and in Congress, members of the press, his secretaries and staff assistants, classmates, fishing companions, and miscellaneous others.

The second decision was that the number of interviewers should be kept as small as possible. Because of the specialized nature of the Project, it was felt that only by keeping its activities within a small, close-knit working group could continuity and depth be achieved in the content of interviews. It was realized, furthermore, that skill in the technique of interviewing would be acquired only by experience and that only by restricting the number of interviewers would any of them develop the necessary skill. As a result nearly ninety per cent of the interviews were conducted by Dr. Crowl and Richard D. Challener, Professor of History at Princeton and member of the Project's Advisory Committee (a complete list of project personnel is found in Appendix C).

Almost immediately invitations to contribute interviews were issued to a preliminary list of 143 men and women. The actual interviewing program was formally launched toward the end of April, 1964. Through the spring and summer of that year, Dr. Crowl traveled in Europe and across the United States with his tape recorder. His interviews were primarily with Secretary Dulles' associates in the State Department, United States Ambassadors, foreign statesmen, and the Dulles family and friends. After his six-month leave from the State Department expired, he continued to conduct interviews in Washington, where a majority of the prospective interviewees resided.

Professor Challener was responsible largely for Mr. Dulles' Wall Street colleagues, churchmen, members of Congress, the military and other government officials, and members of the press. Most of his interviewing activities centered in New York City, but while on leave during the academic year 1965-66, he was able to make frequent trips to Washington and several longer excursions to Canada, New England, the Southern and Midwestern States, and Texas.

It was apparent from the start, however, that it would be a physical, if not financial, impossibility for Dr. Crowl and Professor Challener to reach all Mr. Dulles' associates, scattered as they were from Algeria to New Zealand. Fortunately several opportunities presented themselves.

Spencer Davis, of United Press International, a specialist in Asian affairs, was preparing an extensive tour of the Far East and agreed to conduct interviews in that area for the Project. When he returned to the United States in October 1964, he brought with him the recorded testimony of twenty-one leading statesmen. Professor Gordon A. Craig, of Stanford University, who spent the summers of 1964 and 1966 in Europe, taped eight interviews with European and American diplomats while abroad, as well as three in California. Louis L. Gerson, Professor of Political Science at the University of Connecticut, also agreed to conduct four interviews for the Project during his travels in Israel and India; Bayly Winder, then Professor of Oriental Studies at Princeton, added two more interviews during a trip to Lebanon; Loftus Becker, former Legal Adviser in the State Department, interviewed one French statesman in Paris; and Gerard C. Smith, of the Atlantic Council, substituted for Dr. Crowl in Washington, while the latter was overseas.

All in all, at the conclusion of the Project, the interviewers had traveled to seventeen foreign countries and sixteen states across the nation, including the District of Columbia, and taped 315 hours of testimony from 285 men and women.

After Dr. Crowl's return to the State Department in September 1964, he served as Special Consultant and remained in close touch with the Project's offices by telephone and periodic trips to Princeton. The day-to-day activities of the Project's offices were turned over to an Executive Secretary, Mrs. Bertie Miller. To her fell the multitudinous administrative and logistical arrangements so essential to the success of the enterprise -- scheduling and rescheduling interviews, supervising the transcription of the oral testimony from tape to typescript, recording the changes in the transcripts requested by the interviewees, negotiating with the interviewees on final terms of access, and conducting all office correspondence. Regular transcribers were also added to the staff, and the long process of putting the taped testimony into written form began full force. The first transcript was approved and formally entered into the collection in November 1964. By the close of the Project, the collection consisted of 11,800 typed pages of testimony with individual transcripts varying in length from 7 to 249 pages.

As the work of the Project progressed, the list of possible contributors continued to grow. Before the Project closed almost 450 men and women were invited to contribute interviews. There were, of course, disappointments -- conflicting schedules, ill health, inaccessibility -- which made it impossible to complete all the interviews planned. There were also those who declined to be interviewed, although the majority of these did so because they felt that their recollections were too vague or too peripheral to be of any real value to the Project. The taping of such interviews was not pressed, for naturally the interest of the Project was in quality not quantity.

For the most part there was very encouraging interest on the part of Mr. Dulles' associates to contribute what information they could. Over eighty-five percent of those contacted expressed immediate willingness to be interviewed, and not a few diplomats and statesmen from overseas, whom it would otherwise have been impossible to interview, made special arrangements to meet with either Dr. Crowl, or Professor Challener, while on brief visits to the United States. In addition, at least two score of the interviewees supplemented their transcripts with personal records, correspondence, and even photographs.

Researchers will be pleased to learn (as the list of transcripts beginning on page 1 indicates) that almost all the participants in the Project have been very liberal concerning the use to be made of their transcripts. Only about 20 of the transcripts are temporarily closed or require special permission to read.
Most transcripts have no restrictions whatever, and the remainder may be consulted immediately, with varying restrictions concerning citation and reproduction of texts.

Finally, special mention should be made of the Project's Sponsors. Without the interest and support of the Rockefeller Foundation, Mr. Herbert Hoover, Jr., Mr. John W. Hanes, Jr., and the many other men, women and organizations who gave so generously to the Princeton University Library, the Dulles Oral History Collection would never have become a reality.

The Papers of John Foster Dulles

Throughout his full and productive life John Foster Dulles was a devoted student of history. He saw in the success and failures of the past a continuing relevance in meeting the problems of the present and in preparing for the contingencies of the future. The ill-fated League of Nations had its aspirations and failures to offer as a guide to those who participated (as he did) in the creation of the United Nations a quarter of a century later. When President Truman assigned to Mr. Dulles the monumental task of drafting a workable peace treaty with Japan after World War II, the lessons learned at Versailles became in a very real sense an integral part of the settlements he successfully negotiated.

Considering his interest in and dependence upon historical reference, it is not surprising that Mr. Dulles should feel an obligation to share his many and varied experiences with future historians and statesmen.
Early in his tenure as Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles began thinking about the disposition of his own papers and the records he had meticulously kept during his long and eventful career. Plans were initiated in 1956 for the eventual transfer of his personal and state papers to his alma mater, Princeton University.

From the beginning Mr. Dulles actively took part in the arrangements. Largely through his influence government regulations were liberalized to permit the deposit of classified documents under security-controlled conditions in libraries outside the Federal government. He also selected the historian responsible for assembling his papers. The assignment was given to Dr. Philip A. Crowl, a former Professor of History at Princeton University, then a member of the Historical Division of the Department of the Army. After a number of conferences with Dr. Crowl, Mr. Dulles approved the basic list of major headings, covering what he considered the most significant subjects about which the collection should be built.
It proved to be a considerable undertaking, one that upon completion in 1959 included approximately 40,000 documents and 120,000 microfilm copies of relevant material from the official files of the State Department.

The Papers of John Foster Dulles, now housed in Princeton University's Mudd Library, are divided into major categories.

This portion of the Dulles Papers, covering his entire lifetime, includes letters from and to Mr. Dulles, memoranda of conversations, personal notes and records, drafts of speeches and articles, newspaper clippings, photographs, mementoes and memorabilia, and letters from and to Mrs. John Foster Dulles. The correspondence, writings, and diaries series in this collection are available in a microform publication.

The personal papers of John Foster Dulles may be read by researchers but the reader will not publish, quote, cite, or refer to any part of the papers without written permission from the curator of the Public Policy Papers at Mudd Library.

JFD arranged for the official papers from his time as Secretary of State to be deposited at the Eisenhower Presidential Library in Abilene, Kansas, with the understanding that these papers would be copied and made available at Princeton while they were opened for research. Most of these papers are now available for research at the Mudd Library, and the Eisenhower Library continues to transfer newly declassified documents on a regular basis.

Eisenhower's personal secretary, Ann Whitman, maintained this series for all documents passing between the White House and Dulles. The Eisenhower Presidential Library has supplied copies for the Dulles years which are supplemented by newly declassified records from time to time.

This portion of the Dulles Papers consists of microfilm copies of original documents in the Department of State, many of which carry a United State Government security classification. These documents include selected telegrams, memoranda of conversations, minutes of meetings, briefing papers, and other materials from the official files of the Department of State covering the period of Mr. Dulles' tenure as Secretary of State.

Until such time as the original files in the State Department become generally accessible, applications for access to them should be made through the Mudd Library to the Historical Office of the Department of State. It should be noted that these papers are available only on the same terms as the original files in the Department of State and with the specific approval of the Department in each instance.

Notes on the Use of the Collection

On the following pages are listed in alphabetical order the names of those individuals who have contributed to the Dulles Oral History Project their taped recollections of John Foster Dulles and the events in which he participated.

Each individual is identified in terms of that person's relationship to Mr. Dulles. In an attempt to make this catalogue as useful as possible brief descriptions are also given of the main subjects covered in each interview. The descriptions are, of course, intended to serve simply as general outlines of the principal topics discussed. We warn the reader that gaps are inevitable in a listing of this sort, and we hope that no evaluative sense will be ascribed to the wording used, which is that of the compiler of this catalogue and not necessarily that of the author of the transcript.

Every transcript in the collection, with the exception of those designated "in process," has been reviewed and approved either by the author or a legal representative. With few exceptions, the only textual changes made in the transcripts have been to improve clarity of meaning. In other words, these transcripts represent the nearly verbatim record of informal and unrehearsed conversations and should not be considered literary statements.

The information contained in this catalogue is subject to change. All listings are current as of March 1994.

The Dulles Oral History Collection is housed with the Public Policy Papers in Princeton's Mudd Library, a unit of the Department of Rare Books and Special Collections of the Princeton University Libraries. Exclusive of national holidays, the Collection may be consulted throughout the year on weekdays from 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. (8:45 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. in the summer).

The Collection consists of 282 individual transcripts of tape-recorded interviews. The terms governing the use of each transcript have been set by the author or a legal representative. In most cases the restrictions are effective only during the author's lifetime. With noted exceptions, the terms of the restrictions fall into the following categories:

Open: Transcripts designated as "Open" may be read, quoted from, and cited by researchers upon presentation of appropriate identification.

Permission required to quote or cite: A transcript in this category may be read by qualified researchers but permission to quote from or cite the text in a publication must be obtained from the author or literary heir. Pertinent passages should be accurately identified and the purpose for which they are to be used should be fully described. In general, the library has no information about current addresses of authors or heirs.

Written permission required to read during lifetime: In order to obtain access to a transcript in this category a researcher is required to request written permission directly from the author and include a brief description of the purpose for which the transcript is needed. After the death of the author, the record may be read, quoted from, and cited without special permission. In the few instances in which the term "during lifetime" is not included in the restrictions, written permission must be obtained from the author and thereafter from the author's literary execution.

Closed: A transcript designated as "Closed" may not be examined under any circumstances at present. In several instances, a transcript may be closed for the duration of a specified time period.

Transcripts are available through Interlibrary Loan in the form of microfilm unless access is restricted. Unless prohibited by the author, the Library will furnish a single photocopy of a transcript to a researcher but the record may not be otherwise reproduced, either in whole or in part, by any other device. Applications for photocopies should include a brief description of the purpose for which the transcript is needed, a pledge of adherence to all restrictions placed upon the transcript, and assurance that the desired copy is for personal use only.

Inquiries concerning the Dulles Oral History Collection should be addressed to:

The Dulles Oral History Project owes a debt of gratitude to Mr. Alexander Clark, Curator of Manuscripts at the Princeton University Library, for his imaginative help in establishing the procedures governing access to and use of the transcripts and to Mrs. Nancy Bressler, Assistant Curator, for carrying out so conscientiously the procedures.

The staff of the Project also wish to express special appreciation to Dr. James Shih Kang Tung, Curator of the Far Eastern Collection, for his generous assistance in the preparation of transcripts in east Asian languages.

Alphabetical Index to Transcript Listing

Note: The numbers following the subjects are not page numbers. They refer to the number which preceeds the names in "The Transcripts: An Alphabetical Listing" section. The desired topic can be found somewhere within the short descriptions under the names. Also, bold names which are followed by bold numbers are the interviewees.
