Dear May:

I am so pleased to be writing to you in the wake of the Northern Ireland peace accord. Although the path to peace is rarely easy, I believe that the agreement reached has the potential to bring real calm to what we all have only known as a very troubled part of our world.

I enjoyed reading your letter and hearing the news from your recent trip. And, as always, your kind words of support mean a lot to me. Hillary, Chelsea, and I thank you so much for the St. Patrick's Day gifts. I proudly wore the cuff links and one of the ties on St. Patrick's Day when I met with Prime Minister Ahern.

Best wishes from all of us.

Sincerely,

BILL CLINTON

Subject: 1998-04-10 President's Remarks on Northern Ireland peace

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary

For Immediate Release

April 10, 1998

REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT
ON THE NORTHERN IRELAND PEACE PROCESS

The Oval Office

2:30 P.M. EDT

THE PRESIDENT: Good afternoon. After a 30-year winter of sectarian violence, Northern Ireland today has the promise of a springtime of peace. The agreement that has emerged from the Northern Ireland peace talks opens the way for the people there to build a society based on enduring peace, justice, and equality. The vision and commitment of the participants in the talks has made real the prayers for peace on both sides of the Atlantic and both sides of the peace line.

All friends of Ireland and Northern Ireland know the task of making the peace endure will be difficult. The path of peace is never easy. But the parties have made brave decisions. They have chosen hope over hate, the promise of the future over the poison of the past. And in so doing, already they have written a new chapter in the rich history of their island -- a chapter of resolute courage that inspires us all.

In the days to come, there may be those who will try to undermine this great achievement -- not only with words but perhaps also with violence. All the parties and all the rest of us must stand shoulder to shoulder to defy any such appeals.

PRESIDENT CLINTON: SUPPORTING PEACE IN NORTHERN IRELAND

April 10, 1998

"After a 30-year winter of sectarian violence, Northern Ireland today has the promise of a springtime of peace. The agreement that has emerged from the Northern Ireland peace talks opens the way for the people there to build a society based on enduring peace, justice and equality."

President Bill Clinton
April 10, 1998

Today, President Clinton voiced his strong support and appreciation for the comprehensive Northern Ireland peace accord announced by peace talks chairman, George Mitchell, and the prime ministers of Britain and Ireland, Tony Blair and Bertie Ahern.

Charting A New Path To Peace. The path to peace is never easy, but the parties involved in the Northern Ireland peace process have made brave decisions. They are choosing hope over hate and the promise of the future of the problems of the past. Irish Prime Minister Ahern and British Prime Minister Blair, Senator George Mitchell, and all the other leaders of the parties involved with this effort deserve thanks and support for the historic agreement they have reached.

Standing Strong Against Violence. In the days to come, there may be those who will try to undermine this great achievement. All the parties involved must stand strong against any efforts to use violence to defy such actions.

The Best Chance For Peace In A Generation. These effort represents the best chance for peace in a generation. In this Easter season, British and Irish leaders have followed the admonition of Luke, "to give light to them who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death and guide their feet into the way of peace." For that, peace-loving people the world over can be very grateful.

On this Good Friday, we give thanks for the work of Prime Minister Ahern and Prime Minister Blair, two truly remarkable leaders who did an unbelievable job in these talks. We give thanks for the work of Senator George Mitchell, who was brilliant and unbelievably patient and long suffering. We give thanks especially to the leaders of the parties, for they had to make the courageous decisions. We also thank Prime Minister Blair and Prime Minister Ahern's predecessors for starting and nurturing the process of peace.

Together, all these people have created the best chance for peace in a generation. In May, the people of Ireland and Northern Ireland will have the chance to seize the gift they have been given. At this Easter season, British and Irish leaders have followed the admonition of Luke, "to give light to them who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death and to guide their feet into the way of peace." For that, peace-loving people the world over can be very grateful.

Q Mr. President, what promises or assurances did the United States make to help move this process along?

THE PRESIDENT: Well, from the very beginning all I have tried to do is to help create the conditions in which peace could develop, and then to do whatever I was asked to do or whatever seemed helpful to encourage and support the parties in the search for peace. And that's all I did last night.

Q Did you offer any assistance in terms of financial aid, and what did you think --

THE PRESIDENT: No.

Q -- where did you really weigh in in all those phone calls.

THE PRESIDENT: Well, first of all, the answer to your first question is no. Now, we have, as all of you know, an international fund for Ireland, which I have strongly supported. And I do believe that there will be very significant economic benefits flowing to the people of Ireland, both Protestant and Catholic, in Northern Ireland and in the Republic, if this peace takes hold. But there was no specific financial assurance sought, nor was any given.

In terms of the give and take, you know, I made a lot of phone calls last night and up until this morning -- actually until right before the last session. But I think the specifics are not all that important. I did what I was asked to do. Again, I was largely guided by the work of Prime Minister Blair and Prime Minister Ahern. I had a very -- a long talk, in the middle of the night for me, last night with Senator Mitchell about his work there, and I'm looking forward to seeing him early next week. I just did what I thought would help. And I tried to do what I was asked to do.

Q Mr. President, will you be going to Belfast now that they've reached a deal?

THE PRESIDENT: Well, I really haven't had much discussion about it. No decision has been made. This is not even a day to think about that. This is a day to celebrate the achievement of the people and the peace talks.

Q President Clinton, do you feel somewhat vindicated for the policies that -- including giving Gerry Adams a visa here -- that have come under scrutiny and at times have brought you some derision from other parts of the world for being too provocative.

THE PRESIDENT: Well, when I did it, I thought it would help to create a climate in which peace might emerge. And I believe it was a positive thing to do. I believed it then, I believe it now.

But make no mistake about it. Whenever peace is made by people anywhere, the credit belongs to the parties whose own lives and livelihoods and children and future are on the line. And that's the way I feel today. If anything that I or the United States was able to do was helpful, especially because of our historic ties to Great Britain and because of the enormous number of Irish Americans we have and the feelings we have for the Irish and their troubles, then I am very grateful. But the credit for this belongs to the people who made the decisions.

Q What role do you expect to play from now on?

Q Mr. President, how fragile is the peace agreement? How fragile is it and will it be able to withstand a violation of the cease-fire?

THE PRESIDENT: Well, I think the parties will honor it. They fought too hard over the details -- down to the eleventh hour and then some. They even went past Senator Mitchell's deadline and well into this Good Friday. Given Irish history, maybe it's appropriate that this was done on this day.

So they fought too hard over the details to violate them. I expect the parties to honor the agreement. And then it's really up to the people. The people of Northern Ireland and the people of the Republic of Ireland are going to have a vote on it in May, in late May, and their judgment will prevail.

Will there be those who are disgruntled, who may seek to violate the cease-fire, who are not part of the parties that have signed off on this agreement? There may well be. But if we all stand shoulder-to-shoulder together and everyone understands that the integrity of the leaders and the parties that are part of this process is still unshakable and rock solid, I think we'll be all right. We just need to let the Irish people have their say, and I think they will have their say.

Q What role do you expect to play from now on in this process, in terms of trying to maintain this agreement?

THE PRESIDENT: Well, I don't know. If I can be helpful, I will. That's been my position all along. That's what I tell everybody that talks to me about it. But no decision has been made about that and, you know, the United States believes in this process passionately. I, personally, am deeply committed to it. And if the leaders think there's something I can do to be helpful, well, of course, I'll try. But there's been no discussion about it and no decision made.

Q Mr. President, could there have been an agreement today without your efforts last night?

THE PRESIDENT: Oh, I certainly -- I wouldn't say there couldn't have been. I was asked to help; I did my best to help.

But let me say again, there were people that I was talking to up until 8:00 a.m., 9:00 a.m., even later this morning who haven't been to bed in 48 hours. They sat and talked and worked and fought and argued and got back together. And for some of them, they put their political lives on the line; others may have put even more on the line, as you well know.

And they and the Prime Ministers and Senator Mitchell, who somehow kept it all together, they deserve the credit. I just tried to do what I was asked to do. If I played a positive role, I'm grateful to have had the chance to do so.

Q Happy Easter. Are you going to Camp David?

THE PRESIDENT: I am. We're going up probably in the early evening and I hope all of you have a great holiday. Bless you.

Q What are you going to do about the Middle East?
(Laughter.)

THE PRESIDENT: Well, we got Bosnia and Haiti, and now, I hope, Ireland. And I'll just keep working on it. The Irish thing ought to give you hope for the Middle East because the lesson is: just don't ever stop. And in the end, if the will for peace is stronger than the impulse to avoid it, and the impulse to avoid the tough decisions and the sacrifices that are made -- that have to be made -- then the will for peace can prevail. That's the lesson here.

So I would hope that those who care desperately about the Middle East and want the peace process there to prevail will take great heart here, because believe you me, I know a lot about this. There were a lot of tough decisions which had to be made, nobody could get everything they wanted, and risks had to be taken. And they were taken. And they now will be taken. And it seems to me that the friends of peace in the Middle East should take great heart from this and perhaps we'll even find some examples that could be followed.

Thank you.

Q Mrs. Clinton said that peace in Ireland is an article of faith. Is there going to be any kind of Clinton celebration here this evening?

THE PRESIDENT: I'm celebrating right now, but we need to let the Irish people have their say. That's going to be in a few weeks.

Q Going to let these guys go to sleep?

THE PRESIDENT: Right now I want these guys to go to sleep. I hope nothing serious happens to our country in the next eight hours, because I've got a bunch of pickle brains in the NSC. (Laughter.)

Subject: May Cassidy BC.SIG

Please send the ~~May Cassidy BC.SIG~~ back to me when you receive it. It's gone to typing so you should get it today or tomorrow. She is an Irish relative of the President and sent the First Family some St. Patrick's Day items. We just read the transcript of the presentation of the shamrock event with Prime Minister Ahern and the President mentions that he is wearing the tie and cuff links Cassidy sent. Since it's a BC.SIG, I definately want to add that. Thanks.

Office of the Press Secretary

For Immediate Release

March 17, 1998

REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT
AT PRESENTATION OF SHAMROCK

The Roosevelt Room

10:45 A.M. EST

THE PRESIDENT: Good morning. Please be seated, everyone. This is a wonderful day for all of us here at the White House. It's a great pleasure to welcome the Taoiseach here. Bertie Ahern has given great leadership to the people of Ireland and to the peace process. This is his first St. Patrick's Day here since assuming office, and we're very grateful for his presence. We welcome him.

And I'm going to turn the platform over to you. Thank you.

PRIME MINISTER AHERN: Thank you very much, President and Vice President. It's a great honor for me to be here, my first opportunity as Taoiseach of the Irish people, to be at the White House on St. Patrick's Day. I'm delighted to participate in this wonderful ceremony and to present to you some shamrocks from the land of your forebears.

The presentation of shamrock to the President of United States is a very apt symbol of a very close and friendly relations between our two countries. St. Patrick used the shamrock as a religious symbol of unity and diversity, similar to the motto of the United States - e pluribus unum. And it remains a potent, unifying symbol which is embraced by both traditions on the island of Ireland.

The United States and Ireland are countries which enjoy long-established bonds stemming from our intertwined history. And as you generously acknowledged, Mr President, Irish Americans historically and still today have enriched Americans' way of life with the values of their heritage -- love of family, faith, and hard work, a devotion to community, and compassion for those in need. They are things that we still live dear to. And for its part, the United States has been a constant resource of inspiration and support as Ireland has navigated its sometimes difficult history.

And that solidarity is as vital today as it was during the Great Famine, which we've celebrated in the last few years, of 1845 to 1848, when the United States gave a new home and a new future to hundreds of thousands of Irish men and women. And the ties between our two countries, Mr. President, are now, of course, copper-fastened by an extremely vibrant economic relationship. And the flows of trade investment and tourism between Ireland and the United States have reached unprecedented levels. U.S. investment has made a crucial contribution to Ireland's current prosperity. And equally as a very profitable location for investment, Ireland has contributed to cooperate and to assist corporate wealth of many great U.S. companies.

Mr. President, I'm very conscious that the principle of unity and diversity has been one of the major domestic team of your presidency. The leadership that you have provided on this team has been inspiring, not only within the United States, but also internationally, where it has an immediate renaissance in places such as Bosnia, and Middle East and, of course, in Northern Ireland.

And in Northern Ireland, your inspiring vision of peace, based on the acceptance of diversity, has been matched by your constant support for a process which has experienced its shares of ups and downs. And you've been true to your promise made here a number of years ago, that you would be a friend of Ireland not just on St. Patrick's Day, but every day. And your act of support for the process has not only been constant, but also impeccably fair and balanced. And for that I want to thank you.

The encouragement, the access which you and your administration have provided to all of the participants and that your administration have provided for all of us has inspired us all in good days and sustained us on bad ones. And perhaps the greatest resource that you have given us is Senator George Mitchell, who in his chairmanship of the talks so aptly represents the qualities of goodwill, of wisdom, impartiality and tenacity, which the United States has brought to the Irish peace process.

We're now entering, President, as we've spoken this morning, a decisive period in the talks. The core issues have been well and truly aired over the past months. As George has said recently, we are now in the end game; success will require courage, a willingness to compromise and, perhaps above all, a generous vision which transcended partnership, focuses on the common interest of all who are in the talks and all who share it.

Our task will be greatly assisted by the continued support and encouragement which we know that we can count on from you, Mr. President, and from Mrs. Clinton, from your administration and from our friends on both sides of the aisle of Congress.

Mr. President, I want to thank you for everything you've done. I want to thank you for all that you've contributed to the cause of peace in Northern Ireland. And in presenting you with the unifying symbol of shamrock, I wish you and your family a very happy St. Patrick's Day. (Speaks in Gaelic.)

(The presentation is made.)

THE PRESIDENT: Thank you very much, Taoiseach, and thank you for the bowl of shamrocks . We will proudly display it as a lasting symbol of our shared values and common heritage.

I think I should say in the interest of full disclosure, that my Cassidy relatives in Ireland sent me these cufflinks and this tie to wear on this day, so that I would be properly attired for your visit. (Laughter.)

← May Cassidy

Since last St. Patrick's Day, Ireland has chosen not only a new Prime Minister, but also a new President -- Mary McAleese of Belfast, the first Northerner to hold that office. We also share Ireland's pride in the fact that President McAleese's predecessor, our good friend, Mary Robinson, now serves as United Nations Human Rights Commissioner.

I also want to acknowledge the announcement by a great friend of Ireland and great Ambassador, Jean Kennedy Smith, that she intends to leave Dublin this summer . We thank you for your dedicated principled service to our country. (Applause.)

Mr. Prime Minister, our cultures have enriched one another time and again as impassioned voices called back and forth across the Atlantic. Just as generations of American writers have been inspired by Yeats, Joyce and Beckett, the great Irish musician, Van Morrison, sings of growing up in Belfast, reading Jack Kerouac while a distant radio signal played Louis Armstrong, Sidney Bechet and Hank Williams.

Last year an Irish American, a retired high school teacher named Frank McCourt, won our Pulitzer Prize for his remarkable Angela's Ashes, a memoir of growing up poor in Limerick and New York City in the 1930s and '40s. This writing pulls no punches -- a fact admirers and critics in both of our countries have been quick to note. But his Limerick and his Ireland have changed. We are delighted that Ireland has enjoyed the best run of economic growth in the developed world during this decade, just as America continues to profit from the labors of your sons and daughters.

This is a holiday, a day for laughter and celebration. But let me say something about which we are all very serious. Northern Ireland now has an unparalleled opportunity for a just and lasting peace. The Taoiseach and his government and Tony Blair and the British government have gone the extra mile to create an atmosphere in which negotiations can succeed. George Mitchell has been a very distinguished Chairman of the peace talks, and we thank you for your comments, Taoiseach.

During these St. Patrick's Day events, I will speak with the party leaders who have come here to Washington. I will tell all of them on all sides the same thing. I will say it as clearly and emphatically as I possibly can: This is the chance of a lifetime for peace in Ireland. You must get it done. You must do it for yourselves and your children. It is too late for those who have already been killed by the sectarian violence of the last three decades. But you can do it, and you must, now.

To get an agreement there must be compromise. No party can achieve all its objectives. The party leaders must lead, and leading means looking forward. And it means being strong enough to make principled compromise. Concessions that today might seem hard to accept will seem so much less important in the light of an accord that brings hope and peace and an end to violence. No one will be the loser if agreement is reached. Everyone will benefit from a chance to build a peaceful future. The parties must look at the larger picture, to the ultimate goal -- a Northern Ireland for all, free of cowardly acts of violence, free of the division and despair that have robbed too many children of their futures for too long.

Mr. Prime Minister, today you ask me to stay personally involved in the peace process. I will do everything I can. The United States will continue to stand firmly against extremists on both sides who want to use violence to thwart a peaceful, just solution that the vast majority of the people in Ireland, whom I was privileged to see in late 1995, clearly still want.

As they negotiate, the parties, too, must continue to demonstrate by words and deeds that they reject violence. They must do everything possible to prevent further bloodshed.

Here on the edge of the 21st century there is a growing global community of people committed to peace, to democracy, to social justice; to putting the divisions of the past of religion and race, of ethnicity and tribe, behind them. From Guatemala to Mozambique, even now to Bosnia, the unceasing desire of people for a peaceful, decent life is overcoming the forces of hate and bigotry and violence. Ireland, its leaders and its peacekeeping forces have helped to contribute to the progress of this peace all around the world. There has not been a day in the last four decades when an Irish peacekeeper has not been somewhere on duty as a sentinel for peace in a distant part of the world.

Now all the people on the island of Ireland can be sentinels for peace, if only their leaders will make the principled agreements necessary to give them that chance.

Again, let me say, the days I spent in Ireland in 1995 are perhaps the most memorable days of my life. As we rejoice today in the spirit of St. Patrick, the heritage of Irish and Irish American people, let us remember what the spirit of St. Patrick was, and how he became the first and only person ever to bring Christianity to a distant, alien place without the sword. And let us bring a future to Ireland worthy of that great achievement of St. Patrick.

Thank you, and God bless you all. (Applause.)

Ms. May Cassidy

Dear May:

Thank you for the woolens, the china, the history of the Cassidy name, and other fine gifts. You are so kind to remember us with such generosity. Hillary and I were delighted to hear from you, and we hope you will pass along our best wishes to the entire Cassidy family.

Sincerely,

BC.SIG per Quorum

Dear May:

Thanks so much for the videocassette, photograph, framed painting, and St. Patrick's Day ribbon. They bring back fond memories of our gathering in Dublin, and Hillary and I are glad to have them. We both send our best wishes.

Sincerely,

AP per Quorum

3 - 3 - 1998.

Dear Bill and Hillary,

You cannot imagine my delight on arriving home from Derry to receive your most welcome letter. It was wonderful to hear from you considering the stress and pressure you both have been under of late. I had visited ~~the~~ Derry to see my parents who are both unwell, but thank God in good spirits. Another purpose for my journey was to try to organise some work on the holiday home myself and Roy have bought below the Denegal mountains, it has a beautiful view and over-looks Rough Swilly, where it is reported the Earls of Ulster left this shore to travel to France and Europe. The old rambling house where the Earl of O'Neill and O'Donnell stayed the night before their departure is now a shadow of its former self, but what great memories it must hold.

The place is so peaceful and inviting. We love this area, the news from Derry is that all is well, most people I must tell you are looking to you Bill to help solve this problem as the parties involved appear to be dead locked at this moment.

I often ask myself have the Northern Irish people not learned anything from their troubled past. The ghosts must be let go, if we are to make progress.

Over all I must mention the mood is optimistic for the future, the population at large want peace. It is frightening to hear of bombs going off again and the possible loss of life.

I hope you shall Excuse me for e-mailing your ~~department~~ department at your time of crisis concerning MR. Stann, "it is as evident as a pimple on a pig's nose," what his intentions were, it is also sad to see what greed for power can do to the human race, and to man, MR. Stann is on a vendetta, anyone with intelligence could see that.

must say you both handled the situation a dignified manner, Hillary out-shone her ponents, her intelligence and determination was a breath of fresh air, her support and the stance she took at this time I believe helped in the day. While I recognize you both must endure this ongoing saga, I have a keep down feeling you shall win through.
I must congratulate you Bill on how you handled the crisis in the middle east, you came across as strong, not aggressive but determined to see it through to the end. If I could be so bold to mention to you, as a psychologist, try to stop biting your bottom lip, whenever you finish a sentence.
Please don't take this personally, but as I studied human behavior, it can be taken up as a sign of uncertainty, by those who wish to oppose you or look for a weak spot in your personality. We all know that in today's world the siest way to defeat some one is to Hilles heel. Please excuse me if I appear to be some what outspoken, but as children growing up we were taught to stand against justice of what ever kind and from whatever source it came. My grandfathers most famous saying which was taken up by my own father was "Do not do to others," what you do not want done to you self."

On a lighter side I wish you Hillary and Chelsea a great St. Patricks day, as usual we in Derry Dublin and the rest of Ireland will be proud to see you, the President of America have some Irish blood in your veins the fact that it is Cassidy blood only makes us delighted, that you are a man of peace. Did I ever mention to you that the Cassidy Family cross all religious divides, we are both Catholic and protestant.

I have enclosed a few inexpensive items for yourself and family

Hopefully you might wear them on our great day, to show solidarity with us in Derry and Ulster, that would be nice as sometimes we feel it is bureaucracy that has become important and not the people on the ground.
If I could finish by saying, please mention to Betty Gemie, that our feeling went out to her on her ordeal at the hands of MR. Stan, we sent her our best wishes and remember her in our prayers. Lastly MR. Blain is doing a great job, like yourself to see a favourable outcome to end the discrimination against one section of Northern Irish community. We are grateful to his efforts, he also is in my prayers.

Finally I said for a little prayer, which has never failed to see me through the difficulties that have sometimes afflicted my own life. I say it everyday for my checkers and it always works.

You must say it every Tuesday, with Sincerely and I know God shall bless to your worries and reward you. May God Bless you and your Family. Never forget we are always thinking of you and you are both in our prayers. Hopefully if you can return to your ancestors home-land in May, we shall be given the chance to meet you personally, you do have a great extended cousins and relations of interest now I must do some serious studying if I shall success in my masters in May. Thank you for taking time out to read my letter. Do keep in touch.

Regards and God Bless Mary Cassidy.
